It was a heavy fog, not the absence of lights that delayed the steamer. The pilots on the Norfolk steamers know every foot of the way between Washington and Norfolk so well that they could make their trips without a single light on the river, provided there be no fog, but in fogs the most skillful pilots are lost on the wide ocean, let alone slightly delayed on the Potomac.

IT Is a characteristic of the so-called independent newspapers of Washington that whenever there is a difference between a State and a federal court in the South, or between a Southern State and the national government, they invariably take the part of the latter. The States certainly have the right to regulate the manner of holding their own elections, but a republican judge has decided that South Carolina has not that right, and, according to custom, is sustained therein by one of the Washington "independent" newspa-
